
What is a bot?

As a general rule of thumb our group consider 85% of the population to be bots or synths. I am deeply troubled by the bluntness and size of that number. Is it the actual number although it does not seem to add up with my experiences or am I just privileged with many of the other 15% around me? What bothers me even more is that there seems to be tendency to disregard this group of 85%. As I'm not here to be stifled nor to conform I'm putting this out in search for the right answer hoping we will discuss this matter openly. I'm not judging anyone. I'm just trying to rethink what I've learned and I'm open to being wrong in my innerstanding hoping this will clarify and benefit us all.

So what is a bot?

- someone who believes the main stream media news?
- someone who only serves his/her own good?
- someone who trusts the government?
- someone who does not believe our narrative?
- someone who gets vaccinated in order to stay healthy?
- someone who wears a mask?
- someone who does clearly not want to wake up?
- someone who eats manufactured food?
- someone who believes tooth decay can be prevented by fluoride?
- someone who looks or walks the other way when a person is in trouble?
- someone who riots and plunders?
- someone who gets paid for performing violent acts?
- someone who avidly defends science?
- someone who assists healing others with the wrong tools?
- someone who channels other dimensional beings?
- someone who does not seem to be home when you look him/her in the eyes?
- someone who uses drugs and/or alcohol?
- someone who goes to church and believes God or Jezus will save him/her?
- someone who loves Hollywood movies and actors?
- someone who believes technical progress is only for our benefit?
- someone who believes cash is obsolete?
- someone who is gaming all day?
- someone who believes death is the end?
- someone who believes three dimensions is the only reality?
- someone who commits lesser crimes?
- someone who is afraid of change?

Many more questions could be posed. If many of the above questions can be answered with a 'yes' I'm a bot too. For many decades I've brushed my teeth with sodiumfluoride laced toothpaste. I've eaten lots of pre manufactured foods. I use alcohol. I've defended science as the only truth. I've recently visited a general practitioner in search for antibiotics after a tick bite that went awry. I loved movies and had my favorite actors, many of whom have been named in evil acts. I trusted our politicians and thought I was well aware of what transpired in politics. I've listened to many channelers who have now been debunked and believed them. I was raised going to church on Sundays and praying before each meal and each day at school. I stole several pens and some printing paper from my employer. And worst of all I walked away in fear when two people started fighting instead of me trying to separate them and stop them fighting. If the above is all true you can hardly become more bot than me, can you?

Why did I do all those things? It was because it was the shape of my trusted reality. It was my safety. It was how I grew up, how my parents grew up and how their parents grew up. It was the continuously hammered in, carefully crafted program that taught us all to conform, to trust, to believe all the deceptions, to accept scarcity of everything and the limited abilities of a human as a given. It wasn't easy for me to escape this all-embracing mindcontrol. Partly because I found it hard to accept a different reality and partly because I seemed to be the only one noticing it for quite some time. Many people (loved ones) around me started to question my mental stability and some even went sideways. You all must have had many of those experiences too.

So are you a bot then when you refuse to see through the lies and deceptions? Why is it that one refuses? Are you confident your truth is the only truth? Are you afraid your perception appears not to be correct as in 'no way!' ? Or haven't you seen enough truth to be able to pierce through the veil? Are you seriously willing to reconsider your truths, especially if you have no direct incentive to do so?

I see so many people around me who really care about others. I see many people with a spark of source in their eyes. Many people who are looking for in-depth experiences. Many of whom are not interested in excessive wealth, but just more than enough to be able to live without a constant fight for survival. Many volunteers who spend their time caring in many ways for other people. Giving away their life force energy for sometimes only a faint smile in return. Their group outnumber the ones that do not give st about others. Yet they are all well asleep as we would call it.

Have we done enough to wake these people up? Have we used the right methods to do this? Are we strong enough to deal with the dismissal and rejection of our truths? What is our mission here?

I may be stubborn or stupid but I can hardly accept the 85-15% division. Because division I believe it is. I believe I came here to guide as many as possible to the new reality. If I only would focus on the 'easy' 15% how would that be caring and sharing? How would that be service to others?